▲ The upturned cannon that marks the end of General Roy's base line in Roy Grove, off Hanworth Road, Hampton

Up until now, part of a well-worn cannon and a small black and white iron notice were the only clues to the historic importance of a small grassy site in Hampton's Roy Grove. It marked the arrival of triangulation as the basis of accurate mapping, and what was to become Ordnance Survey.

Until the arrival of GPS, this was the most reliable method of the craft. Our local cannon marked one end where General Roy's base line started. It ran as far as the existing site of Heathrow Airport.

Today you can read all about it on a new information board of detailed explanatory texts and maps created entirely by Claygate photographer and author Paul Doe. Coming across the site when his son was at nearby Hampton School, he found the cannon and the dilapidated notice, dated 1926, the 200th anniversary of General Roy's death.

▲ The new information board researched and designed by Paul Doe.

An appeal to Richmond Council for a Civic Pride grant underlining its Heritage Site status took nine months to come to fruition. With funding secured Paul created the board himself. Like most such boards these days it stands about 4 feet high on stout legs, the surface angled forward for easy reading, and topped with clear plastic. As for the maps within, the specialist Charles Close Society and the Royal Society were generous, the latter providing drawings dated 1785. WV THIS
